Our recent survey shows that support for Amendment Four has stayed strong and stable since our previous research in April. Nearly three-quarters of Florida voters continue to support the Voting Restoration Amendment, which will be on the November 2018 ballot in Florida (74% yes – 23% no – 3% undecided), with support holding from the 74% Yes identified in April.

The amendment maintains the strong across-the-aisle support needed to pass with 60% of the vote required in the state. Six-in-ten registered Republicans support the amendment (59% support), nearly eight-in-ten Independents vote yes (79%), and registered Democrats strongly support the amendment (88% support). There also continues to be strong support across ideological backgrounds, with 92% of self-identified liberals supporting the measure, eight-in-ten moderates voting yes (83% support), and 56% of conservatives supporting the measure.

Amendment Four also receives support across various iterations of demographic subgroups. Over 60% of voters across the state, from the Panhandle to Miami, say they will vote Yes. Nearly three-quarters of white voters (74%) support the measure, just over six-in-ten of Hispanic voters (62%) support the measure and over nine-in-ten African-American voters (92%) support the measure.

The statewide poll is based on a turnout model built on past off-year election results that gives a 3-percentage point advantage in Republican party registration among likely November 2018 general election voters (Democrat 38% - Republican 41% - Independent 21%).
